TENNIS GRUNTS

Psychologists have suggested that grunting helps a player to feel more assured of themselves on court, which will allow them to produce better tennis.

Of the top 30 players in the world of each sex at the time of data collection, 90% of male players and 76% of female players produced tennis grunts during matches. Of these, 50% of male players and 63% of female players grunted sufficiently frequently to allow for behavioural observation (i.e. during at least 75% of tennis shots) and were therefore eligible for inclusion in our data sample. A further 40% of males and 13% of females grunted less frequently

From Andre Agassi to Monica Seles to Maria Sharapova, some of the biggest grunters in tennis history learned the game at the Nick Bollettieri academy in Florida. It's interesting to note that Bollettieri says grunting allows for a "psychological and physiological release of tension".

Grunting can help with the timing of your shot, with Bollettieri saying the noise "synchronises breathing precisely with hitting the ball".

Scientists have established a clear link between grunting and power, with studies showing that those who make some noise hit their groundstrokes 3.8 per cent faster than those who stay silent. And the benefits of grunting are even bigger when serving - grunters serve 4.9 per cent faster than players who are quiet. It seems that it's easier to make more physical effort when you're letting out a loud noise as you do it. Those numbers suggest that instead of posing the question, 'Why do tennis players grunt?', you might ask of those who are silent: 'Why don't they?'

You might not realise it, but you use sound to gauge how hard your opponent hits the ball, and also the direction of the shot. If they're grunting loudly, and you can't hear the sound of the ball on the racquet, that affects your ability to judge the shot. Studies have shown that when their opponents are grunting, tennis players are between three and four per cent worse at assessing where the ball is heading and at what speed. One study suggested that players take 30 milliseconds longer to react. That might not sound like much, but in that time the ball has probably travelled around half a meter through the air.

It has become a part of the game, especially in the women's draw—where about 70 percent do it—and it reflects what an energy sapping sport tennis is.

One devious trick is to let out a huge grunt, as if you've hit an enormous topspin forehand that took a lot of effort, but then throw in a gentle drop-shot. Your opponent won't be expecting that. As Caroline Wozniacki once said: 'If you grunt really loudly your opponent cannot hear how you hit the ball. Because the grunt is so loud, you think the ball is coming fast and suddenly the ball just goes slowly.'

It appears that the pitch of someone's grunting could create what sports psychologists call preconceived "placebo expectations" of an outcome being positive or negative, that have the power to create a self-fulfilling prophecy of victory or defeat. These type of placebo expectations can be part of a winning formula or a subconscious form of self-sabotage.

This study reported that tennis players who grunted in a lower pitch tended to prevail in matches against opponents who were grunting in a higher pitch. The researchers note that tennis grunts are nonverbal human vocalizations produced in competitive interactions that convey static and dynamic information much like nonhuman mammal calls.

The good news is: As part of a psychological and physiological placebo effect, it's possible that by making a conscious effort to lower the pitch of your voice (or tennis court grunts) you can create a self-fulfilling prophecy of actually becoming top of the list by projecting the aura of being "A-number-one and king of the hill."

It's sometimes said that Jimmy Connors is "the father of the tennis grunt", and that he invented grunting in the 1970s, and with every generation of players since the subject hasn't become any less divisive.

Connors says he may not have been the first player to grunt while playing, but he was the highest-profile player to do so. It wasn't meant as a distraction, but he says it was simply the outcome of how he'd been taught to breathe on the court. Connors says that, although he tried to breathe mostly through his nose, opening his mouth allowed him to exhale sharply as he exploded into a shot. Grunting has become so prevalent in recent year in women's tennis that the Women's Tennis Association is now working to eliminate the habit among up-and-coming players.

Through the lens of psychophysiology, Jimmy Connors' unflinching habit of bouncing the ball exactly four times as he exhales slowly before every serve —and then takes a quick inhale followed by the rapid aspiration of a forceful grunt—seems to me like a diaphragmatic technique that squirts out vaguistuff (vagus substance) and calms his nerves. The grunts also appear to synchronize the rhythm of his game with the milieu intérieur (environment within) of his autonomic nervous system.

Jimmy Connors used a low-pitch grunt as a nonverbal human vocalization to assert his dominance in a mythic showdown with Björn Borg at the 1978 U.S Open. Connors emits a bounty of acoustic cues that he is going to win the match as he grunts his way to victory.

Seles' grunting was characterized by its intensity and volume, often described as a combination of a shriek and a growl. Her vocalizations were particularly noticeable during her signature two-handed forehand shots. Seles' unique style not only fueled her shots with power but also left an indelible mark on the sport.

The loudest of them all

Maria Sharapova may look good on the court, but as everyone is aware, she makes a lot of noise. The thing is, did she grunt her way to the Wimbledon title in 2004? If she did, her grunting was nothing compared to the scale of what she achieved that day.

Since that Wimbledon title, she has been the World No. 1, won the US Open and Australian Open but suffered a bad injury which saw her ranking slip a little.

As a grown woman, Sharapova's grunts have exceeded 100 decibels, which might make her the loudest grunter of all time, though there is no official record. She used to say that grunting was just something she had done since a young age. It was part of her tennis technique. Trying to stop grunting when she was in her twenties would have been as challenging as trying to hold the racquet with a new grip. It was always fascinating, though, to listen to her practice sessions, when she would be completely silent; she only grunted when she was playing matches. Seles has said she grunted from the age of eight, and that she didn't suddenly start as a pro.

Grunting doesn't help players win any popularity contests, with fans often muting their televisions so the noise doesn't spoil their enjoyment of the match. It's also not unusual for players to complain to umpires about the sound coming from the other end of the court. Maria Sharapova and Monica Seles spent far more time talking about grunting during their careers than they would have liked.

Like many of these women, Victoria Azarenka does not make a sound in her warm up. But as soon as the match starts, her song begins.

Azarenka's grunt is more of a howling sound and does get rather annoying over a period of time.

Nevertheless, Azarenka has established herself as a class act on the WTA tour and a rather cool and collected young woman.

Another good looking women, but she does make quite a noise on tennis court.

"Boris Becker who beat [me] the first three times we played because his serve was something the game had never seen before," Agassi said in an interview with The Players Tribune's Unscriptd.

"Well, I watched tape after tape of him and stood across the net from him three different times and I started to realise he has this weird tick with his tongue.

"I'm not kidding, he would go into his rocking motion, his same routine and just as he was about to toss the ball, he would stick his tongue out.

"And it would either be right in the middle of his lip or it'd be to the left corner of his lip.

"If he's serving in the deuce court and he put his tongue in the middle of his lip, he was either serving up the middle or to the body. But if he put it to the side, he was going to serve out wide."

Agassi exploited this unusual tick well and did not let on to Becker that he knew, only losing once in their final 11 meetings.

"The hardest part wasn't returning his serve — it was not letting him know that I knew this," he recalled. "I had to resist the temptation of reading his serve for the majority of the match and choose the moment when I was gonna use that information on a given point to execute a shot that would allow me to break the match open."

It was not until after Agassi retired where he gave away to Becker that he knew how to read his serve.

"We went out and had a pint of beer together [at Oktoberfest], and I couldn't help but say, 'By the way, did you know you used to do this and give away your serve?'

"He about fell off the chair. He said, 'I used to go home all the time and just tell my wife, it's like he reads my mind.'

"He said, 'Little did I know, you were just reading my tongue.'"

Me 9 years ago

hey man,, really love the no stairway record.... where did the idea to make this album come from?

Glassine 9 years ago

hey dude, thanks so much!

i used to have to catch the bus from NY where i was living to baltimore and on the way was a sam ash music store. i didn't have much money for synths or anything like that so i decided i was just going to steal their sounds by playing expensive shit and recording it to my phone. so that i could plug those sounds into something later.

then i decided i was just going to record other people playing as a field recording thing. even just for fun kind of.

at the time i was doing a lot of composing out of field recordings i took from street buskers. like composing field recordings - similar to the no stairway process.

then i decided to do the same thing - but with ppl at guitar center as i was moving back to baltimore and there were a few of those stores around. and i kind of disdain the place so it was a robin hood sort of feeling. stealing, giving back, what have you.

at first it was a way to kill time before catching a bus. then it turned into a much larger idea and perhaps some sort of statement about big box music stores in general.

the whole thing was done more than a year ago. real glad it is finally out there in the world.

thanks for the message!

DEATH

Death (Kuolema), Finland

DEATH IS A village in Finland. Near the centre of this Nordic country, in a flat, featureless landscape of tall pines and marshy fields, is the loose scattering of ten or so stout timber houses, some painted deep red and others arctic white. The village has no bank, church, pub or library. It lacks even a cemetery. A straight road divides the town in two, and one can drive through without even knowing it. Swedish photographer Eva Persson spent a year documenting the inhabitants of the village in a series titled Elämää Kuolemassa, or 'Life in Death'. 'Only in Finland can a village be called Death,' writes Persson. 'In Finland, you are born, then comes a long period of suffering, and then you die.' To understand Persson's comment, which at first may appear cruel or morbid, one must first understand that the Finnish identify with death and suffering like the British identify with tea and scones. Perhaps it is the country's unique geographical positioning (balancing between Eastern European pessimism and Scandinavian gloom) that gives rise to a species of melancholy particular to Finland. Yet Finnish melancholy embraces a humour as dark as the Arctic winters. 'When all hope is gone,' Finnish film director Aki Kaurismäki once dryly remarked in an interview, 'there is no reason for pessimism.'

Persson's photo series revolves around the lives of two identical twin sisters who run the village's only supermarket. In their conjoined house, located at the back of the supermarket, the sisters live together with their husbands who are themselves, incidentally, brothers. While the work was produced in 2002, it could have easily been 1982. In this Finnish village, mullets and moustaches thrive without irony and The Bold and the Beautiful features as the latest spectacle to arrive on prime-time television. If the function of death is to relieve the world of that which is redundant, then it appears that death has passed Death by.

There are several theories as to how the town earned its name. One rumour suggests that it occurred in 1888 when a motel innkeeper was murdered by a passing stranger; or, more likely, it originates from an old Finnish children's rhyme that goes Halla, nälkä, kuolema; niskat nurin ja taivaaseen – drought, famine, death; break the neck and go to heaven. Incidentally, this dark yet influential poem also accounts for the names of several nearby landmarks: Famine Hill, Neck Heath and Heaven's Hill.

In ancient Finnish culture, death was surrounded by a complex and lyrical paradigm of mythology and ritual. Believers in soul dualism, the Finns subscribed to the idea that a person was inhabited by not one, but three entities: Henki, Luonto and Itse.

Dreams in Spain

I've been having the most vivid and long lasting dreams I've ever had. Long, exaggerated intertwined stories/narratives that are almost scary. I've had graphic sex w/ Ella in one and have gotten in fights and viciously destroyed a kiosk but have mixed together to create a bizarre world that somehow make sense. They change locations instantaneously but most of the characters stay the same. One moment I'm in my childhood hometown with friends I have made in the city as an adult.

They wake me up. The dreams don't necessarily scare me but the fact that I'm dreaming like this, like I've never done before is astonishing. Dreams that are etched in my subconscious like a drug induced hallucination. Somewhere between reality and fiction. The all too interesting gray area where fear and delusions meet.

You quickly devolve back to when you were a baby and curl up in the fetal position. You cry and you're consoled and you live and you rebuild until you forget. Forget that you had a heart or someone had broke it or even who that person really was. Their voice their touch. You can learn to forget. Time is really good at that until there's a void of something, where there was once a light and now there is not, the feeling of deja vu. there is something missing and there's a faint resonance of love of light and you don't know the source of the light and there's something generating its energy but you'll never really know until the light goes out

As you should know, street credibility never comes easy. Although yes, I am a white 28 year old male from a white middle class family from the north shore of Staten Island with a mix of Irish, German and Italian.I would never hesitate to say I was a straight up street kid that knows these streets by the back of my hand. I have beyond payed my dues as an artist and as a writer: Street smarts simply came as common sense to me over the years comparing to my experiences with drug addiction, mental illness while being on and off numerous amounts of anti- psychotic drugs the government was pumping me with while going in and out of psychiatric wards and jail in my early to mid 20's struggling with severe alcohol abuse. Although I have always lived and resided on Staten Island, the L.E.S became a second home for me over the past 10 years through graffiti which is something I'm trying to leave behind. At this time in my life I have so much more to create through my inspiration from broken hearts, 1000 scars and hitting rock bottom over and over again and again to only grow wiser and stronger each time. As far as my music goes, it is something I picked up over the last 2 years after a finale run in with the N.Y city vandal squad. After 13 arrests and felony charges I started expressing my suffering and lonely misery through bottles of cheap wine and whiskey, and an aqoustic guitar leading to a sort of rythmic drunken howling about completely honest and sincere stories of my life growing up in N.Y. Considering by now I have not much to lose, so I decided to let it all out through hundreds of songs recorded alone in an attic with my mind, a pen and a pad and lots of alcohol and drugs every day and night for over a year. There has been endless amounts of days and nights chasing highs and feelings or aspirations of dreams lived out and conquered. Nights with some of the craziest fucks N.Y had bred. Times of extreme self affliction, nights of heavy cocaine abuse leading to the next afternoon winding up in subway tunnels sniffing the last of the coke, swigging bottles while dodging oncoming trains to paint our names on the tunnel walls, then crawling out on the busy platform looking like filthy rats with glassy wide open tweeked out eyes covered in black soot. Every song contains a small part of my kaotic life to teach and create that of which has never been created or even heard, coming from a chosen one with a voice and a story you will never forget!!!..... Chief Jay Strongbow thought long and hard about training his brother and going after the coveted W.W.F. Tag Team Championship.

He was hesitant because he knows from experience just what a wrestler must go through to become a champion. In fact Jay has suffered through the pain of injuries such as broken legs. Like most families, Jay cares for his brother Jules, and didn't know if he should subject his sibling to the dangers of the ring wars.

But Jules was persistent, he begged Jay to let him become his tag team partner. Jay agreed on the condition that Jules would stick with the training and conditioning program that he set up.

Jules fulfilled his end of the bargain and a new tag team combination was born. So far the Strongbow brothers have yet to suffer a deat as a team. Their ultimate goal is to take the W.W.F. Tag Team Championship from Mr. Fuji and Mr. Saito, and that is what they are campaigning for right now.

THERE IS A STRUGGLE GOING ON FOR W.W.F. TAG TITLE

One of the biggest struggles in W.W.F. history involves the current battle over the W.W.F. Tag Team Championship. Involved in this torrid feud are The Strongbow Brothers(Jay and Jules), and the Japanese combination of Mr. Saito and Mr. Fuji. Something has to give in this situation, as both teams want the coveted championship belts.

THE STRONGBOWS LOOK TO THE FUTURE

Now that Chief Jay and Jules Strongbow know what it feels like to wear the coveted W.W.F. Tag Team Championships belts, they are looking to the future.

The Indian stars have made it clear that their main goal at this point in time is to once more capture that prestigious championship.

They do not allow themselves to dwell on the past. Jay and Jules are well aware of the fact that when they lost the belts back to Mr. Fuji and Mr. Saito, they were defeated by very questionable tactics. But that was then, and now is now, they are on the warpath and the title is their ultimate goal.

WINTER 1995-96

Kill Rock Stars started in 1991, putting out spoken word and punk rock records, motivated purely by the love of the words and music and what they stood for, and the love of the people who make that music and spoken word. We have always tried to give the bands as much control as possible -- when and where they record and who with; when their records come out; what songs are on the record; what the record cover looks like; what formats they are available on; whether or not there is a lyric sheet or other information; how much they cost, etc. There are a lot of record labels out there who completely control many of those aspects of the record-making process, or attempt to, mainly in the pursuit of "profit" or out of lack of respect for the bands, and we don't think that is right. We will NEVER sell out to a major label and we will NEVER start putting out records just for the money.

Though it started as a spoken-word label because I thought it was a very important and exciting thing that very few other labels were doing, I was soon convinced that we could contribute something valid and important putting out music too. A couple exciting things were happening in Olympia in 1991 right after KRS got started. The punk rock scene here was really intensely active, with more great new bands than ever who didn't have any way to put out records, and a lot of people were converging on Olympia for the International Pop Underground Convention. The diversity of the bands was remarkable, but what was especially remarkable was their shared passion and commitment to the idea and ideals of punk rock. This notion of high-quality musical diversity combined with those shared ideals seemed like a pretty cool thing to document, so the Kill Rock Stars compilation came about with that in mind. Eventually it didn't seem comprehensive enough, there were too many great bands out there, so we eventually put out two more compilations (Stars Kill Rock and Rock Stars Kill), and now we are putting out a fourth one, this time a co-release with Lookout! Records, another record label we think is driven by the love of punk rock, and committed to very similar ideas as KRS. Different of course, but those differences and variety is part of what we cherish about punk rock.

The first bands "on" KRS were Unwound and Witchypoo, quickly followed by Bikini Kill and Bratmobile and Heavens To Betsy. All of these bands were basically local, although Bikini Kill and Bratmobile divided their time between Oly and DC. The first band we started to work with who wasn't from around here was Huggy Bear, after we got to know them when they made friends with Bikini Kill, released a split-lp together, and toured the UK together (with Witchypoo in tow). Huggy Bear was really exciting because they came from such a different and far-away "place" and background but their understanding and ideas of punk rock were so similar and feisty. Very rare for England these days. Pussycat Trash was another great, very DIY band from England that we got to know through Huggy Bear and it took us a while, but we finally just recently managed to put out a 7" by them. It is interesting to note that both of those bands have their own record labels (Famous Monsters and Slampt) which shows a high level of commitment.

In 1999 , Black and White came out starring Wu-Tang Clan , Brooke Shields, Robert Downey Jr., Mike Tyson and Elijah Wood.  It was a major flop with a pretty decent cast.  A mix of Belly, Kids,State Property (2) and Killa Season, the premise is a bunch of rich white high school kids emulating hood black dudes being filmed by a documentarian (Brooke Shields).  Downey Jr. plays a flamboyant gay dude who gets slapped in the face by Mike Tyson for hitting on him.  Tyson really slaps him in the movie.

"It was real – a real smack. When he was on the floor he was kicking me and I yelled, 'Ow!'"

Meanwhile, director Toback told drugbag: "It only occurred to Downey at the last minute to ask whether I had told Mike that he was going to hit on him.

"I said, 'No.' Downey said, 'What if he gets angry?' I said, 'I would assume he would.' He said, 'How far do you want me to take it?' I said, 'Take it until he responds in the extreme.' Downey responded, 'What if he kills me?' I said, 'Well, I haven't thought about that. I think it's unlikely—no better than a five per cent chance. But, at the rate you're going, you're going to end up dying in the parking lot of a motel in Culver City. So what would be better ... that or dying like this?'

"Downey cracked up and proceeded to provoke Mike at great lengths to smack him, choke him, slam him on the ground."

The movie is dope as hell. Allan Houston from the Knicks is in it.  Its mad cringe as well. The dubbing of the movies is pretty funny.  Frodo and Shitbreak, the dude from American Pie , saying “nigga” repeatedly and the soundtrack is OD... a lot of rare 90s gems on it like American Cream Team tracks and Xzibit with that dude from Korn... its a good watch, its free on the internet somewhere. Downey drops some knowledge on the origins of the word ‘fuck’...fornication under consent of the king... the more you know.

Quotes:

Elijah Wood - “You gotta meet Will, his brother, he’s the true nigga”
Mike Tyson - “That’s an age old story brother, deceit, treachery...”

Calvin Klein Jeans

Controversial Denim

In 1995, Steven Meisel shot a Calvin Klein Jeans campaign that caused such a level of outrage amongst the general public that it ended up being banned. The campaign itself is by no means shocking. Smiling models in jeans lounge in a sauna-like, wood-paneled cabin, bodies barely contained by the denim that rides up or hangs off them—powerfully erotic, painfully attractive. Something about it did not sit right with the public though. So was this an early instance of cancel culture in an increasingly authoritarian landscape? Or was the condemnation of upskirting and sexual objectification in fact progressive? These are questions on which the advertising industry still hasn't made up its mind. So much easier to just ignore them. The result is that this kind of unabashed sexiness—the self-knowing smiles, the unwavering eye contact (textbook Meisel) feels flagrant in comparison to the kind of impartial, unprovocative sexiness we see now, suffocated under the pretense of empowering shapewear or work-out clothes. If campaigns do evoke sexiness, it's either camp or ironic, never seedy, and often saved from the gray area by
